When we offer services to students, do we make the wrong assumption? Do we spend too much time criticizing alternatives to libraries, believing that all of our services and resources are better? Are we really paying attention to what students really need? Or do we assume that we know what they need?

For the spring ACLCP meeting we would like to take a hard look at all these questions. Judi Briden will discuss the results of the U of Rochester's attempt to "better understand how students...do their work and how the library fits within their lives." Joe Lucia will offer suggestions for creating and offering services that illustrate the social vitality of libraries. Stanley Wilder will ask, "What would instruction...look like if we were to start from scratch today? Join us for what is sure to be an interest-
